New York, June 10 .- Mary Scott Castle Charlton was a San Francisco woman who figured rather prominently in the news. She was thirty-seven years old and her father was H. H. Scott, a coal dealer of San Francisco. She has a brother in the United States army, Capt Henry Harrison Scott, who is married to a daughter of the late Admiral Samp son. She was a niece of Mrs. Monroe Salisbury, who was a leader of San Francisco society for years, and she was a distant relative of Mrs. Benjamin Harrison, widow of the President. She was married first to Neville H. Castle. a lawyer of San Francisco, who practiced for a time in this city. Then she went on the stage and finally married Porter Charlton in Wilmington, Del., on March

MACHINE TELLS VALUE OF NUTRITION IN FOOD

The Department of Agriculture has succeeded in gauging the nutritive value of foods with scientific accuracy. With a complicated piece of machinery the government experts can tell just how much energy there is in a beefsteak or a pudding. The experiments are complete after six years' investigation.

By shoving a piece of apple pie or strawberry shortcake into the apparatus and turning a wheel, the investigators can tell just how much strength such substance adds to the body.

They can tell a housewife to a fraction whether it is better to feed her famly on pate de fois gras or ham and eggs. The machine is called a calorimeter, and its perfectors believe it is as near human as a mechanical contrivance can be. It takes considerable hard work to climb through the long series of calculations that are necessary before the answers of the machine can be made useful, but the agriculturists believe the results are worth the trouble.

Instead of making chemical analyses of manufactured foods. the calorimeter can tell Uncle Sam's watchdogs how much nutrition there is in one of them quicker and cheaper. The machine can even tell whether a meal works up more energy when the man who ate it has been working or resting.

Mr. Jordan, prior to his sale of the savings bank stock, held 2,000 of the original 4,000 shares of that institution, and with his friends upon the board of directors held strong control of the bank. Mr. Jordan engineered the negotiations by which the Merchants and Mechanics Bank bought out the old Traders' Na-tional Bank and incorporated it with the savings bank. He is regarded as among the most energetic and capable of the financiers of the city.
